Part 1 : Reading - From a Small Project to Minecraft

Many people know Minecraft today, but it began as one small project.

Markus Persson, or "Notch," lived in Sweden. He liked computers when he was a child, so he learned to program. When he was older, he made games at work. He also made his own games at home. He wanted to create a game where people could build anything.

In May 2009, Notch started a new game. At first, he called it "Cave Game." It was very simple. It had grass, stone, and blocks. A player could move around and look at the block world, but there was not much to do.

Notch did not wait to finish the game. He chose to share it online. People could test the game as he made it. They told him what they liked and what was wrong. This feedback helped Notch. Some players also suggested new ideas.

Notch read what the players wrote. He fixed problems and used some of their ideas to improve the game. He added more blocks and more things to do. The game changed often, so players came back to see what was new. They also told their friends about it.

The small project became popular. Notch chose to continue his work, and he helped start a company called Mojang. More and more people played Minecraft. In 2011, the full game was ready.

Minecraft grew because Notch shared it early, listened to players, and continued to make it better. One simple idea became a game known around the world.
